

When I first followed the link to this video, I was very confused by its hour-long runtime... but after watching it, I realized that it was probably one of the most influential hours of my life. He was funny through it all, even with the presence of his own death laid out before him. I can certainly relate to what he said, and I do wish that someday I can cross everything off of my own bucket list. This really does make me feel sad, however, the fact that Randy can explain all of this without tearing up over the countless days spent helping people out as well as accomplishing everything he set out to do in life is simply indescribable. I know he made a positive influence in this world, a much bigger one than most people ever will accomplish on such a grand scale, and he certainly made a positive influence on my life and I hope that I can take some of his advice to heart and maybe help out others as well. This is probably what affected me the most, the thought that I can influence somebody and that it can start a chain reaction. This video made me question my own life, and whether what I've done has had any sort of impact on myself and/or others, and I have realized that I want to do more, and I plan on doing more to try and find some purpose that I can fulfill, some reason for doing everything I've done, and ever will do. I hope that once my own life comes to a close, I will have the strength like Randy to not back down, but find something to inspire everyone around me to inspire even more people. Randy's last lecture was a masterpiece, even if it wasn't meant for us, the audience. The lecture itself even seemed to have even more of an impact because of the fact it wasn't intended for the audience. I know the lecture helped me in some way, and I'm glad that I spent my time watching it, even if a little heartbroken that someone so influential was giving his last lecture.
